

Glycolysis has two key functions:

1. Generate some ATP from the free energy available from the rearrangement of the atoms in monosaccharides (particularly glucose).
2. To partially break down glucose and so provide a starting point for the complete oxidation of glucose by another pathway to carbon dioxide and water with the generation of much ATP. The pathway is named for this splitting function - lysis of glucose =glycolysis.